The War on the Upper Ohio.

In accordance with the order of the Adjutant General issued last week, the McCreary and Nuckols Guards left this city Monday morning, in company with a company of the Louisville Legion and a section of artillery from that city, who came up the evening before and spent the night here, for the purpose of assisting in guarding Neal and Craft, the Ashland murderers, to Catlettsburg. At the time the militia left it was rumored in this city that a large number of men in Ashland, Catlettsburg and Ironton, Ohio, had banded themselves together and sworn that the murderers should never leave Boyd county alive, and great apprehension was felt here lest our boys would have trouble after a change of venue was granted, and they should attempt to remove the prisoners, and the papers were anxiously searched each day for news from Catlettsburg. Until Wednesday afternoon no information of an alarming nature was received, and it looked as though the trouble was all imaginary; but about 4 o'clock in the afternoon of that day a dispatch was received from Mr. Charlie O. Reynolds from Hanging Rock, Ohio, announcing that there had been a fight at Ashland, but the boys were all safe. The news spread rapidly and created great excitement. Large crowds gathered on the street corners and about the telegraph office, and everything in the shape of news was eagerly caught at, but nothing of a satisfying nature could be gotten hold of until the official report of Maj. J. R. Allen was issued as a supplement to the Yeoman Thursday morning at 9:30 o'clock. It then became known that the boys had reached Lexington and would be at home on the afternoon train, and arrangements were made to give them a sort of informal reception.

When the train arrived a large crowd gathered and escorted the two companies to the State House Yard, where an address of welcome was delivered on behalf of the citizens by Hon. Ira Julian, which was responded to by Col. J. Stoddard Johnston on behalf of the soldiers, and then the boys were dismissed and allowed to go to their homes.

They were soon surrounded by friends and eagerly questioned as to the events of the day before, and each corroborated fully all the statements of Major Allen made in his official report. One young man told us that every one on board the boat would be willing to swear to the truthfulness of that document. It seems Major Allen was notified Wednesday morning that a mob had gathered at Ashland and were searching every west bound train for the prisoners, and determined to return with his command by river. While making arrangements to leave, a train filled with armed men arrived from Ashland and demanded of him the surrender of Neal and Craft, which demand he promptly refused to accede to, and it looked as though a collision between the mob and troops was bound to follow; but just at this time the Steamer Granite State arrived, and the soldiers and prisoners were taken on board, the McCreary Guards covering the retreat down the river bank. As the boat left the mob informed the soldiers that they had 2,000 men and two pieces of artillery at Ashland and would catch them there. They then returned to their train and began a race with the boat to Ashland. At a point a mile or two below Catlettsburg, where the railroad runs close to the river, the men on the train opened fire on the militia, the shot striking the water all around the boat but not a shot was fired in return. This doubtless led the mob to believe there was no fight in the soldiers, so they pushed on to Ashland, took possession of the ferryboat, and as many as could get aboard did so, pushed out into the river, hailed the Granite State and attempted to stop her; but as their commands to stop the boat were not heeded, they fired a number of shots at the soldiers, slightly wounding several of them, when Major Allen gave the command to fire, and it was obeyed with a will, and the ferryboat was soon too badly disabled to follow them further.

The McCreary and Nuckols Guards were stationed on the hurricane deck of the steamer, and at them the principal fire of the mob was directed, but both companies bore themselves like true soldiers, especially the Nuckols Guards, who had to fire over the McCrearys, while the latter were lying down behind a temporary breast-work. Dr. Alvin Duval, Assistant Surgeon, received a bullet in his coat; Sergeant Harry Graham, of the McCrearys, had a bullet pass through his helmet; Corporal Duncan Holmes, of the Nuckols, was grazed under the left eye by a buckshot, and Private Louis Scott, of the same company, had the end of the second finger of his left hand shot off, and received a scalp wound from a buckshot.

The mob were armed with shot guns and pistols, and fired not only from the ferryboat, but the bank, many of the soldiers saying that they distinctly saw the flash of guns all along the levee at Ashland, from the river to the head of the grade. All the boys we talked with say their fire was directed against the men on the ferryboat, and not once did they fire towards the crowd on the bank. The soldiers were also fired at by a few on the Ohio side of the river, and it is their belief that many of the wounded on shore were shot by the mob. The statement by a correspondent from Ashland that there were only twenty-five intoxicated wild boys on the ferryboat is rather thin, as everyone who was in the fight says the boat was full of men closely crowded together.

After leaving Ashland there was no further trouble. The boat reached Maysville in time for the troops to take the train for Lexington, where they arrived about ten o'clock Thursday morning.

It is to be regretted that so many valuable lives were lost at Ashland on account of such scoundrels as Neal and Craft, but those who are most ready to condemn the militia for their course would have acted as they did under the circumstances, and perhaps worse. And had they surrendered the prisoners to the mob these same fault finders could not have cursed them enough.

A very quiet elopement took place from this city last week, so quiet in fact was the affair conducted that outside of a few intimate friends of the parties interested but few persons knew that they were married until several days after their return to this city. Mr. George Shaw, youngest son of Mr. J. R. Shaw, had for some time been paying his addresses to Miss Eliza South, granddaughter of the late Col. Jerry South, but some of her family did not approve of the match and concluded to send her to the home of a relative in one of the Mountain counties. Accordingly she was placed upon the morning train Wednesday of last week, at Jones' Station, and instructed to proceed thither; but Mr. Shaw had been notified of the programme and left this city on the same train. When the train pulled out from the Station he stepped into the ladies car, took his ladylove in charge, and together they went to Aberdeen, Ohio, and sought the services of Squire Massie Beasley. That gentleman was not at home, but had gone to Georgetown, Ohio, on business, and after waiting all day for his return, they took a buggy and proceeded to Ripley, thence to Georgetown, where they were finally made one flesh by Squire Beasley, and returned to this city Friday morning.

Says one, "Kendall's Sperm Cure is the best I have used for human flesh I ever used," and thousands have extolled it in similar terms.
